SECURITY

Joseph Conrad could describe a tropic night at sea so you were there while you read it. Somewhere he said that the stars shed their radiance as if to give assurance of everlasting security. Everlasting security - what is it? Certainly nothing in the present world fits the definition.

To be sure the moon will wax and wane and the tides will come and go, sun-up and sunset will be the same, all the awe-inspiring phenomena of the universe will be observed as in the time of Copernicus, but what of us poor devils who are not astronomers but just spectators of the convulsions going on in a belt of territory less than ten miles high? We would like to move out or up to where there is peace and security, but the means of getting there have not been provided and we are left perforce, to stew in our own juice, a juice that is nonetheless bitter because it is of our own making.

Granting that personal and financial security is not perhaps to be guaranteed us, do we have any clear picture of the future security of the written or printed word? Assuredly we have. If the history of the present struggle comes to be written by the would-be conquerors, may they not begin de novo and provide us with a proper world history beginning in the year 1943 for instance? Naturally all that has gone before will have to be destroyed, but that should not prove difficult for a nation that has shown such efficiency and determination in exterminating printed matter. Perhaps some future Ignatius Donnelly would be able to piece together the remaining fragments of what would be left of the world to provide meditation for generations yet unborn.

The answer that the son of Adam gave the Lord was in fact no answer, and we had better be our brother's keeper. Moreover, it is time for each of us to get ready to reply to the question put in Falstaff's time, "Under which King, bezonian? Speak or die!"
